All places are temporary palaces. All palaces are temporary places. Architecture resides in the precariously delicate position that dictates how buildings are posed while simultaneously altering to fit what they become. The way a space is articulated becomes a source of friction. It is able to slow down or speed up time and alter thoughts or nuances of movement. Architecture is a network, the intelligence of the smallest unit dictating the overall system. Layers of sensory intimacy and curiosity create social by-products of experience that we use as building blocks.
